The Town is aware of the challenges associated with the lack of reliable high-speed internet in certain areas of Halton Hills and is actively working on this issue by coordinating with key stakeholders. Recognizing the current environment as more people work remotely and students learn from home, this webpage was developed to provide an update on rural broadband in Halton Hills.

What is broadband internet?

Broadband internet refers to internet access that is always connected and faster than traditional dial-up. The Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC), which is responsible for coordinating the provision of high-speed broadband internet in Canada, has a target to bring download speeds of at least 50 megabits per second (Mbps) and upload speeds of at least 10 Mbps to 90 percent of homes and businesses in Canada by the end of 2021.

The CRTC is responsible for coordinating the provision of high-speed broadband internet in Canada and has declared broadband internet a basic telecommunications service. However, it is Telecom Service Providers (TSPs) who are responsible for building, owning and operating broadband infrastructure and services.

What is the main challenge associated with bringing broadband internet to rural areas?

Many rural areas across Canada, including Halton Hills struggle to access high-speed broadband internet. A lot of Telecom Service Providers (TSPs) do not have existing infrastructure in rural areas to provide sufficient connectivity and the cost of providing this service makes developing an effective business case a challenge.

The gap in broadband infrastructure in rural areas is primarily due to the lack of dwelling density necessary to make a viable business case. As a result, TSPs have typically focused their infrastructure investments on more dense and larger urban markets where their return on investment is higher.
